I recently took a class on Georgia folklore. It was a class about how my part of America, the south, was different from the northern and the western parts of America. Many things in this class I learned or had heard of from my grandfather. Most of the material in this class was from traditions that were only a few hundred years old, so my grandfather had told me much about it in his stories. Many people who live in the South don’t know about their special history: where they came from and how their recent grandparents and great-grandparents lived. The southern states of America have their own history in housing, food, celebrations, and furniture. Some of this can still be seen today.
